The focus of this latest issue of Good Practice magazine, Expanding the Practice Spectrum, examines the range of traditional and alternative psychology practice options emerging in today’s health-care marketplace. Whether working in a traditional private practice, an alternative practice model, an integrated hospital-based system, or in Medicaid, psychologists will need new tools to meet technological, economic, legal and regulatory challenges.

Expanding the Practice Spectrum was the theme of the APA and Practice Organization’s annual State Leadership Conference (SLC) held in February 2016. Every year at SLC, approximately 400 psychology leaders from across the United States and Canada come together in Washington, DC, for four days of advocacy, leadership training and to examine major issues affecting professional practice.

Through this issue of Good Practice, we want to give our thousands of readers an opportunity to benefit from the rich content of SLC and information shared on current and innovative ways of practicing psychology.

You’ll read advice from experts representing an array of practice settings, law firms, risk management firms and insurance companies. All offer practical tools and guidance to help you thrive in an evolving health care environment, whether you explore new models of practice or maintain a traditional practice. And as in previous issues, we highlight a psychologist using skills and expertise in novel ways and close with a patient/client education resource that can be removed from this issue, copied and distributed.

The Practice Organization is here to support our members by providing you with tools and resources to help you sustain your current practice or prepare to be at the forefront of new and emerging models of practice.

I hope you enjoy Good Practice.

Katherine C. Nordal, PhD
Executive Director for Professional Practice

Follow Katherine Nordal on Twitter, @drnordal.